Tags:Specific and nonspecific cell entry pathways of human immunodeficiency virus type 1 in T-lymphocytes. The mechanism of infection by the human immunodeficiency virus type 1 (HIV-1) in T-lymphocytes has been studied using synchronized cells from the Jurkat human leukaemia cell line. These cells were evaluated for the ability of different virus preparations to infect and kill the cells. The results confirmed previous observations that HIV-1 can spread across the T-cell plasma membrane through a "nonlytic" route that is cholesterol-dependent. In addition to the "nonlytic" entry route, there was a distinct cholesterol-independent route that enabled the virus to escape from the infected cell in some cases. HIV-1 preparations that retained infectivity after treatment with trypsin, heat or acidic pH failed to enter cells through the nonspecific pathway. Both routes of virus entry showed similar abilities to infect and kill cells. A third route of virus entry was identified that was only observed in unsynchronized cells and was shown to involve an initial interaction between CD4-receptors and the virus followed by a "lytic" entry route. This "lytic" entry route was blocked by antibody to the CD4 receptor. The size of the fusogenic
