Climate skeptics have seized on those data to say the previous record of warming was just a statistical fluke. Matthew Spencer, professor of atmospheric and oceanic science at Scripps Institution of Oceanography, said that the number of warm years is a measure of what's happening to the global ocean. And there's been no change for a couple of decades. "As far as I know, there's no explanation for why the ocean is keeping its heat," Spencer said. "The ocean is the main sink for all that extra heat that we are adding to the atmosphere. If the ocean is not taking that extra heat and keeping the planet's average temperature low, then what are we doing that's keeping the planet warm?" If the ocean were warming, then it would be storing heat. But it's not, so it wouldn't be surprising if the atmosphere wasn't warming as well, he said. The sun is "the bright spot" for the planet, Spencer said. "That's another piece of evidence that I would agree with, and that's the overabundance of solar energy in the system, in our budget, and not being used," he said. "It's like you have two children of the same parents. If you take the good child away, the bad child will grow even larger. We're having a bigger effect than we're creating." But Spencer said that the evidence is scant. "
