The Syrian army and allied forces have seized “large swathes” of land from the Islamic State group (ISIS) in the countryside of Palmyra, an activist group has reported. According to the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights (SOHR), which has been monitoring the situation in the province, the army and allied forces have captured large areas of land in the city of Palmyra in the eastern Homs countryside on the day of the attack. “They [ISIS] have lost about 90 percent of their area,” SOHR director, Rami Abdel Rahman, told AFP news agency on Saturday. He explained that the strategic city of Palmyra, which was recaptured from ISIS by the army and allied forces in March, is located 30km from the city of Homs. The SOHR reported that the army and allied forces were conducting a coordinated operation with the help of warplanes and missiles in the battle to retake Palmyra. Rebel fighters have reportedly been shooting at ISIS positions in the city in order to break their resistance. Palmyra, a UNESCO World Heritage Site, was captured by ISIS in May of last year. US Defense Secretary Ash Carter warned on Thursday of the Syrian army being in danger of defeat in its battle to recover the city, telling reporters in Washington: “There is a danger of losing control of the city of Palmyra because of the determined resistance that the Islamic State is putting up.” Video on the internet shows ISIS fighters, some in Humvees and armoured vehicles, shooting at Syrian soldiers as they man checkpoints in the city’s streets. READ MORE: Life or death: How to hide in Palmyra before the battle The SOHR reported that the army and allied forces, backed by militias, have secured large parts of Palmyra and are now preparing for an assault on the city’s citadel. The SOHR also said there were no signs of major civilian casualties since the start of the assault on the city. In the past month, the army and its allies have seized back control of more than 70 percent of Syria’s territory from ISIS, including
