These conflicting statements were corroborated by press reports that hinted at the possibility that the IRS was "working with other agencies to revamp Obama's health care plan." And if you want to believe that those security protocols weren't being put into place after the rules were changed, you can believe that. In March, the White House announced that it would delay some of the new security measures until June. A little more than six months later, the New York Times reports that the IRS is still struggling to incorporate the security changes into its systems. And this is just the most recent of the numerous reports of problems with the security protocols that the IRS and President Obama himself have acknowledged are still in place. The IRS problems are also being compounded by the agency's continuing claims that the information it has collected has not been compromised. "I continue to be satisfied that the information that we obtained in this case was in no way used improperly," IRS Commissioner John Koskinen said after the reports of the IRS targeting conservative groups surfaced. "This is to say again," Koskinen said, "that the IRS did not provide extra scrutiny to conservative groups. That allegation is absolutely false." It's a broad assertion that the agency cannot substantiate with any evidence. But even if the information was not used for improper purposes, there's no question that the IRS did hold on to the information it collected, and there's a very clear question about whether that information was used for improper purposes. How about the story that the IRS was "b
