On June 27, 2019, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) published the first draft of the updated rule on Urban Connectivity Vehicle Design (UCVD) requirements for the evaluation of pedestrian protection. At the same time, the director of NHTSA, Mark Rosekind, announced that he had "significant concerns" with the scope of the proposed rules, which would require almost all passenger vehicles to meet a new standard in pedestrian protection, potentially making them "a nightmare for consumers to operate safely and comply with all federal, state, local and international requirements to be operated on public roads." As anticipated, opponents of the rule, such as the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers (the automaker trade association), filed a petition for a stay in court, but was denied by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, where the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration is based. Critics of the rule have raised a range of concerns with its implementation, including the operational challenges of having a giant electronic display on the side of a vehicle that's aimed at passengers. However, the real issue with this rule is the intrinsic flaws and problems with the rulemaking process and the likelihood that it will have unintended consequences to the public. The comments of critics, the impact of the rule to vehicle sales (which have slowed down as a result of confusion over the rulemaking process), and the lack of any empirical data to support the rule's effectiveness or affordability have all been left out of the discussion. The problem with this rule is that it is based on flawed economics as a basis for risk–benefit analysis, but it completely ignores a host of intangible concerns such as the uniqueness of the personal and psychological impact to victims, their families, and the communities they live in. NHTSA has a long history of "car-centric" regulation, where the regulatory agenda was always dictated by car companies that manufacture vehicles, not safety and traffic-related organizations, and generally ignores the effects of a policy on the health and safety of vulnerable road users. Some of the problems with the current rulemaking process are best described in a blog post by Fran

B. Symons of Virginia Tech, who chronicles her experience in participating in the rulemaking as a citizen and expert panelist. Since the publication of the public draft, the NHTSA has received numerous public comments, filed in response to the comments received. Many of

Elder Scrolls Online Preview: Game Details Revealed Bethesda Softworks has revealed the remaining game details for The Elder Scrolls Online. Zenimax Online Studios, the studio behind The Elder Scrolls Online recently revealed the game's new trailer. According to Zenimax Online

Studios, the Elder Scrolls Online is sure to revolutionize the MMO genre. It is a long awaited game from Bethesda and its developer. But what does this game have in store for us? Is it going to be just another boring MMO? Or is it going to be a good alternative for your standard MMORPG?

Gameplay One of the major differences that we are going to witness with The Elder Scrolls Online is the leveling experience. At the moment, The Elder Scrolls Online is similar to other MMO games where you have to level up to level 15 and then buy a better weapon or armor. Unlike other games, you don't have to level up to gain the better abilities. You can just go straight to level 50 or even level 60 and still have access to level 15 abilities. You even have to level up to level 65 if you want the ability to teleport to the next area. Even though you have to level up to gain the higher level abilities, it is still easy to gain them due to the new skill called "Adept" which is comparable to other MMO games' "Gems" system. The Elder Scrolls Online works on a "Skill per Point" system where you will need to level up in order to have more skills for a point cost. In order to max out these skills, you will have to spend three to five points depending on the skill. With the leveling skill explained, let's move on to what The Elder Scrolls Online has to offer. A lot of players already know the awesome combat system in Elder Scrolls. But what sets The Elder

Scrolls Online apart from other MMORPG is the PvP. This game will have PvP battles that you can participate. The fights will feature both PvP and PvE content. This means that you can go into a PvP area and you can easily interact with other players. But if you don't want to PvP, then you can
