The study will be repeated twice in order to assess the temporal stability of the effect. The overall goal of this study is to determine if serotonergic agents can antagonize the effects of cocaine in humans. It is hypothesized that in cocaine abusers, the long-term use of serotonergic agents will result in decreased craving for cocaine, decreased positive subjective drug effects, and decreased motivation to use cocaine. In Study 1, remoxipride will be administered to twelve cocaine abusers while they are in a 3-day cocaine or placebo substitution study.

Subjective drug effects, craving, and motivation will be assessed during daily drug sessions. In Study 2, remoxipride will be administered to twelve cocaine abusers for 3-days while they are in a cocaine and placebo infusion experiment. The effects of remoxipride on the subjective effects of cocaine will be assessed throughout the infusion period. If remoxipride is found to be effective in these studies, then a large sample of cocaine abusers could be prescribed this drug as a long-term treatment modality.
