Activation of somatic muscle cells and the transcription factors that control these cells are key to successful adaptation to environmental conditions, particularly hypoxia. However, the mechanisms for adaptation to hypoxia remain poorly understood.

Based on studies of muscle and myocardium, we propose that the transcription factor, hypoxia inducible factor-1alpha (HIF-1alpha), plays a key role in hypoxia adaptation. We hypothesize that HIF-1alpha is a master transcriptional regulator that stimulates a cascade of additional transcription factors, and ultimately increases transcription of hypoxia-regulated genes. This hypothesis is supported by the experimental findings that HIF-1alpha is constitutively expressed in heart and muscle, that expression is increased by hypoxia, and that genes that have HIF-1alpha binding sites show increased transcription in hypoxia. While HIF-1alpha is important in muscle, the mechanisms by which HIF-1alpha activates transcription in muscle remain unknown.

The long term objective of this application is to understand the role of HIF-1alpha in hypoxia adaptation of skeletal muscle. The specific hypothesis is that the primary function of HIF-1alpha is to act as a master transcriptional regulator, activating transcription of hypoxia-regulated genes. The specific aims are to (1) elucidate mechanisms by which HIF-1alpha regulates transcription in muscle, by identifying DNA sequences and proteins that interact with HIF-1alpha in vitro and in vivo in muscle cells, and by identifying genes that are regulated by HIF-1alpha in muscle cells, and (2) investigate the in vivo function of HIF-1alpha in hypoxia-induced adaptation of skeletal muscle. These studies will elucidate the molecular mechanisms for hypoxia adaptation in muscle cells, and will establish a role for HIF-1alpha in this process. Because skeletal muscle adaptation to hypoxia is defective in diabetes, determining the mechanisms 3da54e8ca3
