At the ASBMB annual meeting in Boston, Walter Moore, a biochemist at the Scripps Research Institute in San Diego, Calif., gives a talk entitled, "Recombinant protein complex purification from Eukaryotes," a topic in which he has been "working for a long time," he says. His work, with Michael Snyder, a protein biochemist and biotechnology company founder at the University of Florida in Gainesville, was published in Biochemical Society Transactions in 2010. The guidelines represent a culmination of Moore's work since then, and the motivation for the article was to prepare a single resource for those who deal with such large complexes, notes John R. Walker, a graduate student in chemistry and biochemistry at the University of California, San Diego, who has consulted Moore in this context. "This has been a long-term effort," he says. "Michael [Snyder] and I have both been assisting people with large complex proteins for the last 10 years. It's important to have guidelines that are very specific in terms of what things to make sure you do, and what to avoid." Walker collaborated with Moore, Michal Sabel, a chemist at Scripps, and other colleagues to compile the protocols, which offer suggestions for purifying and crystallizing protein complexes, advertisement In the eyes of the authors, there are two major types of eukaryotic proteins, which they recognize as being the major source for the study of large complexes. One is the proteasome, and the other is ribosomes. Proteasomes, for instance, are large protein complexes that facilitate the destruction of damaged, superfluous
