I want to make a clockwork model that resembles the gears in a self-winding watch that can be put back in a watch case or displayed in its separate case. What tools can I use to build the replica? I have a limited budget. A: As you are self-learning I will give you some basic steps. 1. Find a schematic of watch which you want to manufacture. 2. You can purchase kits online or from watch/clock parts stores. I am not sure if i understand your question clearly. But i am giving what i understood. A: I don't recommend this way as it will be very expensive. I would instead go directly to 1:1 clockworks that are around $50-100 or more. They will be made of solid metal that is often plated brass and they will come with enough of the raw materials (cables, springs) to allow you to work on the watch. They will also have the basic workings (pistons) etched in so that you can replicate your design. I would recommend saving your time and money for something that will actually get you closer to the design that you want to build. The present invention generally relates to biodegradable polymeric materials and to methods for forming same. More specifically, the invention relates to such materials which include an active growth factor(s) and may be used for cell growth and encapsulation of tissue. Biodegradable polymers are finding increasing use in the area of medical applications. For example, they are employed in place of more conventional, nonbiodegradable materials, in the fabrication of controlled release implants, and, in some cases, in the construction of synthetic biological devices. In these applications, the ability to tailor the physical properties of the polymer would be a great advantage, but to date, one has not been realized. That is, known biodegradable polymers can be made to be biodegradable or they can be made to have certain mechanical properties by simply altering their chemical composition. In e79caf774b
