Oxygen Not Included v210489 Torrent/Key.Q: dynamic creation of non-generic functions Let's say I have this function that takes a class and an interface as input: `public void DoSomething (T classToInstance, I interfaceToInstance) { T instance = //get this instance somehow classToInstance.DoSomething(instance, interfaceToInstance); }` What is the best way for me to dynamically create classes that implement those interfaces? I've seen people using `Activator.CreateInstance(Type)`, I can create a function that takes a `Class` and an `IConvertible` as input. However, my point is the tricky part is I may only know the name of the class I need and the name of the interface, not the full type. There is also another problem... I create an object at runtime and I pass that object in. However, I might do something weird and do not want to (or cannot) ask the user for the new type when creating the object. What is the best practice in this case? I also do not want to create a new class in the function. A: There are a few ways that come to mind... Option 1 - Dynamic Code Generation This is the "easiest" - your run-time-generated method is fairly simple... public static class Helper { public static void DoSomething (T classToInstance, I interfaceToInstance) { T instance = Activator.CreateInstance(typeof(T), instance) as T; classToInstance.DoSomething(instance, interfaceToInstance); } } Option 2 - ExpandoObject This doesn't use reflection, so it isn't as "clean" - but it does use a
