Creating a Photoshop
document As with other graphics
programs, Photoshop's main window (refer to
a workspace where you create images

and much more. So after you create your document, you can manipulate images within that document. After you save your document, it becomes one of your images. You can apply effects and graphics to other images in Photoshop by bringing them into the same document. Before you import or copy a file into a Photoshop document, you must make sure that the file formats match Photoshop's, as the file formats do not necessarily match that of the other program. If you get the file formats wrong, you may or may not see your imported or copied images.

Icons for the different tools and functions You can tell whether a tool or function is available by looking at the icon at the left end of the Edit Area. In other words, you can see a little picture icon with a pointer. For example, the Pencil icon you see in Figure 4-1 indicates that the tool is available and the pointer is pointing to the tool. In this book, I use arrows, an equal sign, a triangle, and a square to represent the different tools, as you can see at the bottom of the window in the figure. In addition to the tools, you can access different layers and also layers settings using the icons at the bottom left of the Edit Area. Note: Keep an eye on the cursor in the figure. The image changes depending on which tools you have. If you see a box or an X in the figure, you have pressed the Undo button. If you see a brush, the tool is selected. To make certain you know which tool is selected, look at the icon at the bottom right of the window. You can also hover the cursor over the tool to change it without clicking it. For example, hovering over the Brush icon in the figure changes it to the Brush tool. If you click this icon, the Brush tool is selected. Hovering over the Pencil icon, which is the topmost tool on the window, selects the Pencil tool, as you can see in the figure. In the top right of the Edit Area, you can choose the Tools option from the General option to choose which tools you use most often. By default, the

General Tools
feature is unchecked, which means that you can

Your car's automatic climate control system is just getting crunched After the initial blast of cold air, your car's climate control system has the energy to generate a milder temperature for your comfort. But how much energy your car system uses to do that may be about to become a problem as automakers design their cars to become more fuel efficient. A recent study by two Berkeley researchers says that the energy your automatic climate control uses to maintain the temperature inside your car might actually be wasting energy. And that it might lead to a situation where the energy needed to keep your car warm in the winter is greater than in the summer. “We conclude that when analyzing the climate control performance of a vehicle, one needs to consider not only the benefits of the air conditioning versus the fuel saved, but also the cost of the lost cooling,” wrote lead author Daniel Archer and post-doctoral researcher Ruslan Artemov at the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory. But while it’s good for the Earth, the study also shows that the savings may not be as big as automakers report. In the study, the researchers simulated how much energy your climate control system uses when it's running. They found that the cars could save more energy by running their climate control systems at lower temperatures. That means the cars might be running their climate control systems at temperatures that are below the temperatures they were designed to maintain. That's kind of a problem for the automakers because they don't want to risk damaging their cars. But it's good for the Earth because that means they're using less energy to keep you comfortable. But because of the study, automakers might have a hard time selling their cars to customers who have climate control systems. For one thing, the study found that automakers aren't properly accounting for how much energy their cars use to stay comfortable. That means that it's not like you might buy a lighter-colored or energy-efficient car and see savings in your electric bill. The researchers found that the energy used by automatic climate control is actually

costing you money,
not saving it. And
that's because the climate control
system is running
at higher temperatures than
it should be. And that costs more energy./* *
