Photo courtesy of alexwyse.com If, as some astute observers claim, the "the universe is not opaque," then using a large telescope in highly inhospitable regions like the desert or at sea can be a valuable tool in the search for alien life. That's the theory behind the Swarm project, a NASA-funded program to build an intergalactic nervous system. As NASA project manager Alex Wyse put it, the Swarm mission will be for other worlds "what the Space Age was for ours." The Swarm team is planning to do just that, launching up to 40 cubesats, each about the size of a video game console, into orbit in 2014. Their goal is to provide a network to enable observations of any star cloud that may be on the near-horizon side of the Milky Way. From there, scanning radio waves could identify planets that may be in that zone of habitable-zone stars. NASA and other researchers like to refer to this type of research as Astrobiology, but the concept is more specifically known as SETI—the search for extraterrestrial intelligence. "Our hope is to find members of the Milky Way and the nearby-galaxy exoplanets that are similar to Earth," says Wyse. "This is the biggest unknown universe." Swarm isn't the only space experiment aiming to answer that question—or to ask a different one: How close is our galaxy to holding alien civilizations? And although there are many "parallel experiments" at NASA and elsewhere, Wyse's Swarm project is the only one looking to set up a communications system. "If you want to find evidence of extraterrestrial activity, we need to keep looking—and Swarm is one of the best tools for that," Wyse says. While we may believe that the universe is mostly "opaque," the Swarm team insists that it's not. During his Ph.D. work with his adviser Subrahmanyan Chandrasekhar, Wyse wrote a paper in 1991 arguing that information can propagate through quantum structures. But to prevail on other planets, information has to last long enough to get there. Most of the probes astronomers send into space are made of materials that quickly break down, and so they're only capable of short-range observations. So
