With WiFi's popularity on the rise, the networking protocol has started to take over the world at a far bigger scale than we're used to. It's now a main part of daily life, affecting everything from our homes to our work from the small networks in the coffee shop to the larger, more complex networks in the corporate sector and beyond. While you can hook up a modem to your computer, you can't hook up a modem to your bedroom phone, for example. You can connect your laptop or cell phone to your home Wi-Fi network, but to connect to your router or satellite uplink you would need to be physically at that location. The problem is that many people are now in a position where it's not really practical for them to use one or more of these technologies. People work from home, they work on the train or the plane, and the office can feel like a walk away from their home location. How mobile connects to home The cloud is everywhere these days, which is why it makes sense that most people these days have a smartphone or tablet. That means
