Because the minority leader in the state Senate is a Republican, don't expect the GOP-controlled legislature to debate and pass gun control legislation to prevent shootings like the one that left three members of Denver's police force killed on March 14th. But the Colorado Senate is considering legislation to provide health care to our state's domestic abuse survivors and survivors of sexual assault. And it's the Senate that decided to pass a bill to provide safe havens for Colorado citizens after school shootings and other threats of violence. This week, Colorado legislators voted on a bill to provide health care to victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. These survivors are often left behind by the rest of society because of the stigma surrounding these issues, the fear of retaliation or of being attacked again, and because they aren't considered as legitimate victims as those who were shot in school shootings or those who had survived a mass shooting. The victims aren't always told by police that they should leave without their children or their belongings, and some are told by police that they have no right to remain in a place where they are vulnerable. Colorado's proposed legislation does two things: It provides insurance coverage for people who report domestic violence or sexual assault, regardless of income It would provide coverage for protective orders for people who are the victims of domestic or sexual violence According to Colorado legislator Jared Polis, one of the main sponsors of the legislation, this legislation would make domestic violence and sexual assault "a health care issue just like any other illness.” Unfortunately, this legislation doesn’t go far enough to address the real problem in Colorado: we need to address the root causes of domestic violence
