Office of the Press Secretary
Contact: 202-282-8010 WASHINGTON - Today, following two exhaustive, five-day elections observing missions, the International Election Observation Mission (IEOM) announced the conclusion of the May 1 and May 2 elections in the United States. The missions found the elections to be credible and free and fair, holding public rallies, interviewing voters, and gathering other important information. The IEOM has now concluded all missions in the United States for the first time in its history. "The IEOM has independently verified elections across the United States, including in 53 countries," said Nick Nuttall, director general of the IEOM. "Today's announcement completes the first step in the IEOM's new strategic goal - to further a principled and objective standard for the international community. The IEOM has a proven track record of meticulous observing missions; this is what it is best at and only, and we are proud of the election work we have undertaken." Prior to the May 1 primary, the IEOM visited polling places in 31 states and territories, conducted 70 public rallies, interviewed 100 voters, and gathered data from over 12,000 surveys. On May 2, the IEOM will conduct its final mission, which will investigate the election in Oklahoma and the post-election processes and constitutional reforms. The IEOM mission team found the election process generally to be orderly and highly professional. The IEOM also consistently found that voters were satisfied with the outcome of the election and made c9d1549cdd

Deletion mutants of the catalytic subunit of type 2A protein phosphatases were created to investigate its nuclear localization and to understand how the dimerization is important for the nuclear targeting. By deleting different regions of the C-terminal domain, the minimal nuclear targeting domain of the PP2A.CTD was determined as amino acid residues 301-431. The nuclear targeting domain contains a zinc-finger domain that recognizes the nuclear localization signal (NLS) in the nucleus. The
