kids are going to get two hours of mayhem before you even hit bed that night. So you go into their room and say: "Look, I'm not trying to be mean. I need you to go to bed because I'm going to need my sleep for tomorrow's soccer practice." They'll think about it and, if they have a good night's sleep, they'll start to think about helping you. Kids will handle the truth because they'll appreciate the honesty. That's the best way to keep the lines of communication open. Tweetable Truths to Keep the Lines of Communication Open with Kids When you're trying to find out what's going on with a kid, it helps to start by asking questions like, "What do you need to get done today?" "How are you feeling?" and "What do you want to do today?" Kids are born curious. They want to have these conversations and learn about the world. Keep that open-ended conversation going and you'll get a whole lot more information than you expected! Q: API Documentation for an ASP.NET MVC API + API Documentation I have a library that I have developed as an API, using ASP.NET MVC 4. The library is intended for public consumption, I want to publish the API documentation on my Blog site(albeit, for privately internals use). I'm wondering how to structure it? I have a Controller/ApiController that serves the API data, which in turn gets mapped to our Entity Framework models. I have separate view models that the view uses to present the data. Lastly, I have a CommandModel class which populates the ViewModels, like so public class NavigationItems { public static BaseCommand ServerItemsCmd { get; set; } public static BaseCommand TopOffersCmd { get; set; } }
