For the second time in the last two years, Ford has taken the wraps off a Transit — a new model that's meant to serve as the replacement for the aging Ford E-Series van and come in at around half the cost. The Transit has the first real surprise of the day. It's called the New Transit Connect and it's completely done over from top to bottom. Although it looks to be basically the same as the E-Series, in terms of functionality it's almost brand new. The look is a bit like a "stranger" wearing a suit jacket with a wallet hanging off his back. Rather than looking like the E-Series, it looks more like the Ford Escape; it's not as tall, not as heavy, and, well, you know, I don't want to repeat the previous points. The New Transit is a good size, and there's plenty of room to stow things in the cargo area. It does start up with all sorts of bells and whistles. The backup camera seems to be in the center console, the engine starts, and the vent windows open automatically. We also like that there's a steering wheel rather than the old-style glove box — I hope Ford does go down that route with its larger vehicles in the future. When the doors close, there are no latches. You have to figure out how to latch your door.
