What's new:

& Trolls for Theophilus Therapy I (Gabriela Luna) have been collecting together some of the puzzles published in my ongoing series of Theophilus Therapy for more than five years now. When they still consisted mainly of doodles and drawings from my (rough) attempts to translate the ancient Greek apophthegmata (phrases of advice, teaching, and wisdom written on gravestones and inscribed by famous philosophers). That they have now gone through a process of systematic composition, a process that's melded inextricably with the more technical aspects of forensic translation of ancient texts from their original Greek or Latin. It is now, with these, a series of puzzles that may be easier, harder, or much the same to solve than merely to enjoy. Of course, as always, there will always be the madcap collectors and readers intent on pulling these apart to see how, which is precisely why I compiled that incomplete list of puzzles at the beginning. So at the very least it's like getting a journal of your very own private AP number! There is a common misconception that puzzle art is simply about how one can take an everyday object, a difficult, often everyday, object, and either gently or hard sell it; or even 'market' it as something other than what it actually is. In this case, the object or item is a gravestone and, as I have noted here, these are usually the bits of stone with the most varied items inscribed upon them - the ones that are shaped by human hands but contain a great deal of effort. This is where the puzzle comes in, and it's the degree to which we are able to take that commonplace detail, that stone with a later gravedog incised into it, and simultaneously work with and against all common meanings and associations, to create a truly profound piece of art. I have been doing this from July 2006, so I've had time to curate my own non-exhaustive collection of the puzzles - I suspect that, for all the many thousands published in that time, I haven't managed to catch more than a small percentage of them (though I'm not opposed to the theory that they could, or should be, completely randomised). This one came to me via the Steve Huff blog. It's a lovely piece; the diptych is dynamic and takes us through the entire history of the English nation. The
