Roblox (pronounced "rock-box") is an online game platform and game creation tool that was developed in 2004 by David Baszucki and Erik Cassel. It allows users to program their own games (called "blocks") and then play them on any platform that supports the game's block syntax. Roblox was released in late 2006 as a download from the Web site. As of 2016, the user base is over 132 million people and growing, which includes more than half of all American children under the age of 16. Roblox has been compared to Minecraft and various iterations of Second Life. Roblox is free to play, with in-game purchases available through a virtual currency called Robux. Some basic features include: creating different types of game environments, programming game functions within "blocks" that add game logic to the platform, selling in-game virtual items, and an economy that allows users to trade Robux for game items. Players can subscribe to an optional membership that grants certain privileges, including a free account. Robux can be purchased with real-world money, and the minimum purchase is $20. In-game purchases include: Robux (the virtual currency), upgrades, and premium membership. Robux is the only currency that can be used to purchase items, even after the player has upgraded to an adult membership. Players can register on a Roblox server by logging into a website and creating an account. Roblox was designed to allow servers to have custom themes, user permissions, and administrator privileges. As of 2016, Roblox hosts over 13 million servers with over 4 million different servers, and claims that more than two billion hours of playtime have occurred. I remember them being a sort of Sonic Youth spinoff with a flute player who played like "he was running his hands over a piano but through a garbage disposal." There was also a drummer who looked like he had been dropped off the Starship Enterprise. Anyone who's ever seen the movie "Superman" or a similar thing like that has seen a Fraggie Rock concert. You can take it from me that it's just like that. There was also a bassist who didn't play. Some of them were, like, six feet tall and could barely fit through doorways. I've heard these guys do a bunch of cover songs for things like "Hootenanny." That's a fiver for two of them. You can't take an audience who saw them in the 70s and tune them back up to play the same set in the 21st century. The whole vibe has changed. You also have to keep in mind that most of them are dead now. But if you're going to squeeze them into the show, you have to put them into a really long set. So there are a lot of chipper, happy ♡804945ef61
