The present invention relates to a hand-held power tool comprising a motor, a drive mechanism operatively connected to the motor for transmitting torque and rotation to at least one tool member, a voltage source for delivering a voltage to be converted into mechanical energy by the motor, and an electric current-conducting bar for conducting the current in the motor, wherein the hand-held power tool is provided with an adjustment device for adjusting the rpm (revolution per minute) of the motor relative to the rotating speed of the tool member, and an operating mechanism for setting the adjustment device. There are known hand-held power tools that comprise an electric motor for the generation of torque and rotation, a drive mechanism operatively connected to the motor for transmitting the torque and rotation to at least one tool member, a voltage source for delivering a voltage to be converted into mechanical energy by the motor, and an electric current-conducting bar for conducting the current in the motor. In such a hand-held power tool, the control of the electric motor is adapted to the type of work that is to be performed by the tool member by varying the rpm of the electric motor relative to the rotating speed of the tool member, whereby a rotation speed of the electric motor may be set corresponding to the respective requirements for the work. In particular, hand-held power tools can be used for cutting stone and concrete, painting, glazing, siding, coating, plating and the like. For performing such work, it is required to set the rpm of the electric motor corresponding to the required cutting depth and the required operation time for a workpiece. This is effected by setting the rpm corresponding to the depth of cut, that is, by controlling the adjustment device that is provided for setting the rpm. The rpm is set by manual operations or by a manually operable or motor-operated setting device. For setting the rpm, a handheld power tool is provided with a setting device that may
